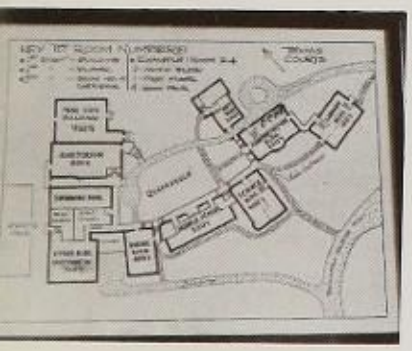
"I remember L.A.K.E."

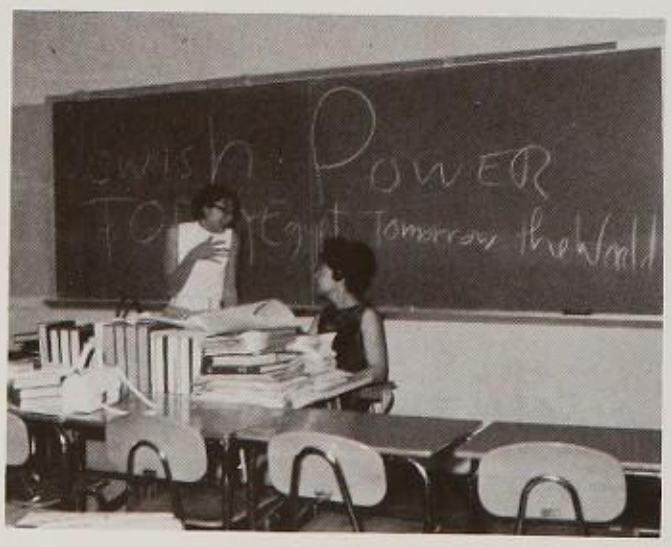
"I never felt I had milked everything. There were always things I hadn't done. And more I could have done."

"I remember, most of all, that with some of the teachers I had the best arguments in my life."

"Everybody thinks that everyone else is a typical Fieldstonite."

"The stage. Mr. Garland. I love Mr. Garland. Bathrooms. An estate, it looks like an estate. My locker. The hill. And breaking rules. That's what I love best about Fieldston. And my favorite water fountain in the Fifth Form corridor. That's also Mr. Heller's favorite. We're buddies."





"Well, you know, the other day, I kind of did see what was the epitome of Fieldston. I walked into the Senior corridor and these two kids were having a duel. Did you see it? Well, they were there, all dressed up in white, with foils and padding, and this other kid was there, crawling around, and somehow it just struck me that this was Fieldston. I mean that these two were dueling, and the administration let them, and the kids thought nothing of it."

"I remember my frog vividly."

"I remember certain smells more than anything, smells that remind me of First Form Spring, I really liked First Form Spring."

"Wrong place, wrong time, and I deserve better."

"That's what I remember, writing furiously with a pencil. I get caught up in a song in the middle of a test."

"The only thing I'll remember about Fieldston is Miss Spodheim. The only class that ever kept me awake."

"The student council activities. I suppose that's what I've found most."

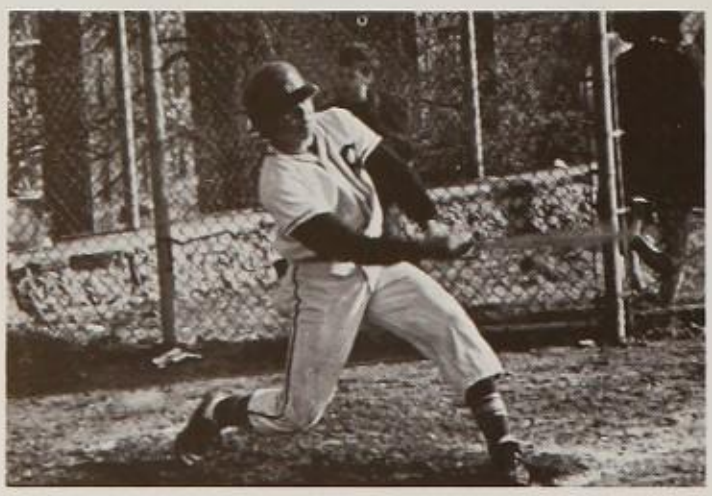
"Want to hear what I'll always remember: 'Here comes a bevy of beautiful maidens.' That I swear I'll always remember."

"I guess today."

"Saks Fifth Avenue. You have my answer, pure and simple."

"The nicest thing in Fieldston—you know, directly academic—Greek and Latin, 'course, up to that point, I'd never thought of Classics."

"Severe depression."



"I remember watching the clock, and seeing it finally tick to 9:40 or 10:45 or 11:30."

"You can always have a good time if you have your own one person to look forward to seeing every day."

"The Third Form corridor the last day of school, we went out and came back an hour after it was all done, and we stood at the end of the corridor and it was so empty . . . just so empty, and it had been so full, and now it was so clean and empty."

"Oh, the food, and the crazy rules that won't let you go out for it . . . I remember the food."

"Just about everything has shocked me. I came from a small school—I was the only Jew—hey, that's what shocked me most. When I came—you know in my last school I was the only Jew. And all at once I was a majority. And it scared the hell out of me. Because it was so new."

"The highest thing in Fieldston is the hill."

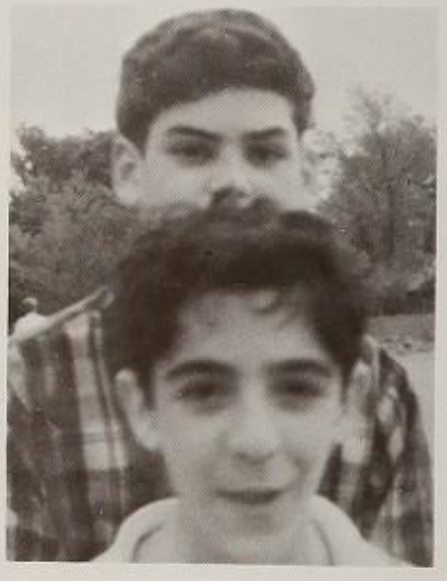
"I was terrified on Orientation Day, both Orientation Days."

"It's a whole way of life. That's something I resent about it. It forces me to lead an entirely Fieldston way of life."

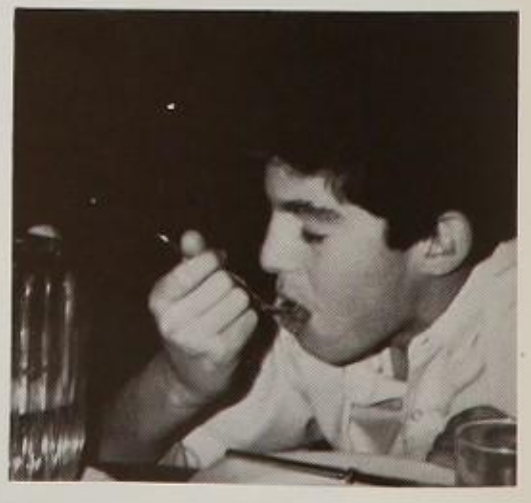
"Third Form, now that was the best year, but I don't remember anything about that."

"What I associate most with Fieldston is plastic. The Art Department is so full of it. Even more than fieldstone."

"It's full of a certain kind of atmosphere in different seasons. It feels the same as last year's March or December."

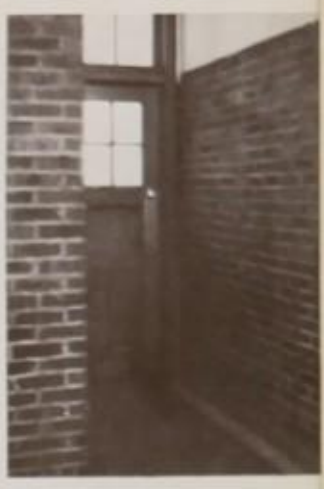


"Bricks. I think of bricks. Now, don't get me wrong, not bricks in a negative sense. Bricks and thick walls."



"Talking to people who you really don't want to talk to."

"Somebody at Fieldston asked me did I ever see rich people riding the subway."



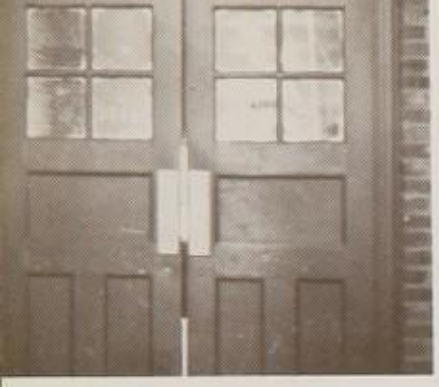
"As a senior, you'd think I'd have perspective. But I have none."

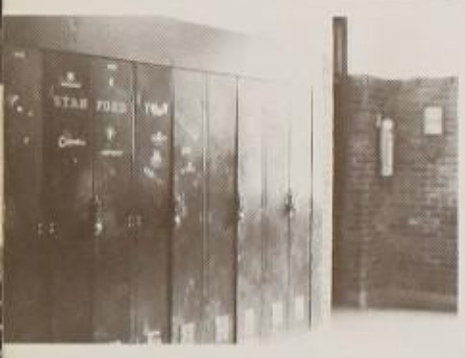
"Security. It's a very secure feeling to know that you'll be coming back each September."

"I've gotten a 'good' education, but I'm not sure it's so good. I've read the right things and learned the right disciplines . . ."

"I never would have struggled had I not been pressured by my parents. That's a Fieldston thing."

"If you get into the pattern of it and work, you're happy."





"I am very attached to the school. Every time I walk through the place, I consider it my home."

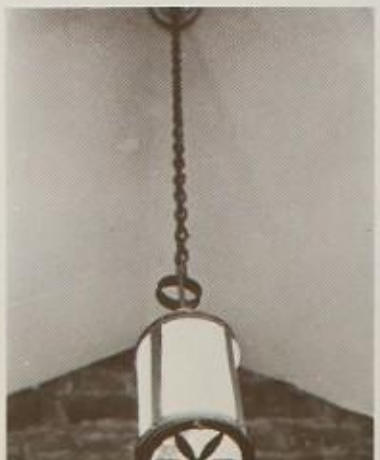
"Fieldston? It's: 'How much did you study? Did you study much? I didn't study at all.' "

"Fieldston makes you want more than anything to be absolutely different from everybody else, and group everybody else together. It's a compliment to be called crazy at Fieldston."

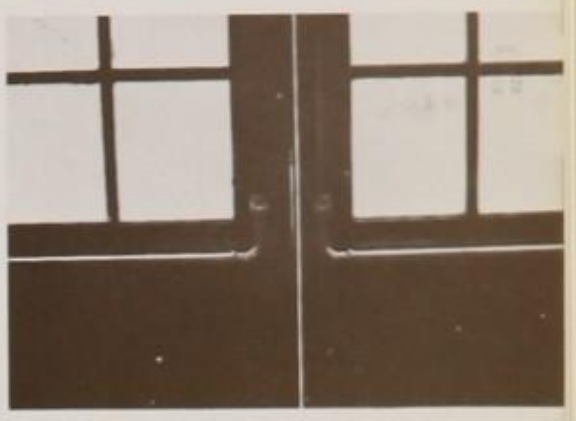
"One long six-year argument. I remember George Geller beating me up every day . . . I also remember him being my best friend."

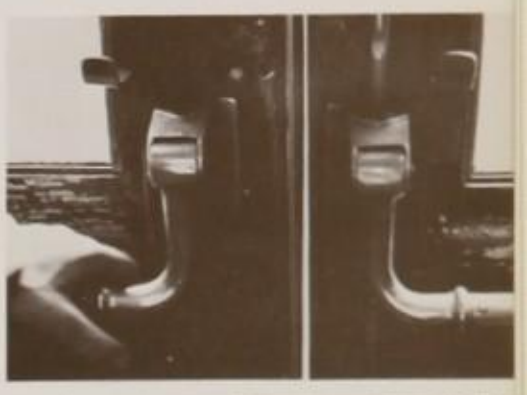
"The whole school used to be overwhelmingly great. Now it isn't."

"The people are culturally oriented. They can enjoy art museums and stuff. At the same time, they don't have this instinct thing about life that a slum kid does."



"I like seeing teachers walking on grass."



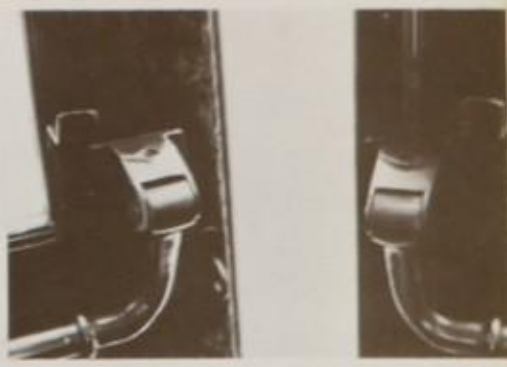


"I want to tell you something really profound: Fieldston makes me nervous and uptight."

"Do you know what my mother did? You know those ugly bushes outside of school? She planted them all outside, and I said: 'Oh my God, every time I see that I'm going to think of this place.' "

"The bomb threats. I remember in First Form, we saw a movie about bugs."

"I don't know . . . just some of the people."



"I don't want to tell you what I think of Fieldston, because it's dirty."
